Categories: Consultation response

As a long standing resident of Whitminster I have seen this lovely rural village grow without too much consideration for developing housing for retirement people or the elderly.
Would it not be better to build a few retirement bungalows thereby freeing up a few family size homes in the village to people who would like to stay in Whitminster and buy a larger home. The emphasis is always too much about how much a developer can squeeze into an area for housing, and the older people are forgotten.
People choose to live in rural locations, for reasons that have now become even more apparent to those living in towns and cities because of Covid, so why not keep them for mixed ages rather than excluding the people who are usually the beating heart of these communities.

Kind regards

A Whitminster house holder.
